The development of severe brain injury has been associated with the occurrence of 'burnout', defined as the 'inability to continue working and associated with symptoms of depression and anxiety'. There is controversy as to whether burnout results from trauma-related brain damage, intrinsic brain dysfunction or can be fully explained by a combination of both. Some authors argue that if such burnout is associated with psychogenic impairment, then the trauma might have been a 'trigger' for the emergence of a preexisting personality disorder. Posttraumatic anxiety disorder and temporal lobe epilepsy have been reported to occur in association with burnout syndrome. Moreover, in severely brain-injured persons, 'accelerated voluntary self-destruction' has been described. In this report, we will summarize a fatal burnout syndrome in a severely head-injured man and will try to explain the circumstances of the emergency situation by reviewing the literature available on the topic. Because of the high mortality, an optimal treatment of high-risk patients with severe brain injury is highly desirable. Although a lot of studies on burnout have been published in the last decade, a 'burnout-specific' pharmacological treatment is still missing.The scar on Murchison's knee that will stay with him for life The "beautiful" scar that will stay with swimmer Cameron Murchison for life began as a painful knee injury in his final year of the Ontario Swim School. "It wasn't very pretty," the 17-year-old told the Hamilton Spectator. However, Murchison knew he couldn't afford to let it interfere with his dreams of the 2012 Olympics. "It was really bad," he said. "I was in a great deal of pain." Things only got worse when Murchison's knee blew up, keeping him out of the 2011 Canada Summer Games. "I couldn't get any sleep," he said. "I was in a lot of pain." After consulting with his doctor, a coach
